1. Script

The year is 1824 and you are born in Southwark, London, on the wrong side of the river. Your home smells of tar, wet wool, and the Thames at low tide. Your father is a cooper. He bends oak staves into barrels for the breweries along the bank. He is a broad, silent man who believes any problem can be solved with a hammer and enough patience. Your mother takes in washing. Her hands are always red, always cracked, and always moving. She has one saying, and she says it every single day. Keep moving, love. Standing still is for the dead.

You take her seriously. Maybe too seriously.

By age 4, you can outrun the dog. By age 7, you can outrun the boys twice your age. You race them across London Bridge, dodging carts, horses, and old women with baskets of eels. You lose a shoe once. You win anyway. By age 10, the local shopkeepers pay you a penny to run messages across the river, because you get there before the ink dries.

Your father watches you sprint down the lane one evening and says the only compliment you will ever hear from him. That boy's legs are worth more than my whole workshop.

He's right. In a city like London, a poor boy only owns two things. His back and his legs. And yours are excellent.

Years pass and you turn 16. You become a porter at Billingsgate Market. Every morning before dawn, you carry baskets of fish on your head, stacked three high, through crowds so thick you could walk on their shoulders. It's brutal work, but you're fast. The fastest. The fishmongers fight over you. You earn enough to give your mother half your wages. She stops taking in so much washing. Her hands begin to heal.

For the first time in your family's history, things are getting better.

Then comes the autumn of 1846.

It's a Tuesday. You're cutting through the docks to save time, as you always do. Above you, a crane swings a crate of Portuguese wine off a ship. You hear a rope snap. Someone shouts. You look up.

Big mistake.

The crate lands on your right leg just below the knee. You don't feel it at first. You just hear it. A wet crack, like a barrel stave splitting in the cold. Then you look down and see something white sticking out of your shin. It takes you a moment to understand it's your bone.

Then you feel it.

The dockworkers lift the crate off you. One of them takes one look at your leg and turns away to vomit. Another ties his neckerchief around your thigh. They put you on a cart and someone says the word you have heard all your life, the word every poor Londoner fears more than prison. Hospital.

In 1846, hospitals are not for people like you. Not unless someone important says so. To be admitted as a charity patient, you need a letter from a subscriber, a wealthy donor who pays for the right to recommend the poor. Without that letter, the hospital owes you nothing.

Your father runs. You've never seen him run before. He goes to the brewery owner he's made barrels for these past twenty years and stands in the man's doorway, hat in hand, until he gets the letter. It takes four hours. You spend those hours on the kitchen table at home, biting a wooden spoon while your mother holds your hand and tells you to keep breathing. She doesn't say keep moving. For the first time, she doesn't say it.

By nightfall, you're admitted to University College Hospital.

The first week is disorienting in the best possible way. You have a bed. An entire bed, to yourself. The sheets are clean, mostly. A nurse brings you beef tea every morning and a pint of porter beer every evening. A pint of beer. In a hospital. Doctors prescribe it to keep your strength up. You decide that whoever invented hospitals was a genius.

A young house surgeon examines your leg. He presses on the swelling and says it's a compound fracture, which means the bone broke through the skin. He says some surgeons would take the leg off immediately, but he'd like to try to save it. He sets the bone. You scream so loudly the whole ward goes silent. Then he splints it, bandages it, and pats your shoulder.

You'll keep it, he says. Probably.

You hold onto that word for days. Probably.

The man in the bed next to you is called Silas. He's old, at least sixty, with white whiskers and a face like a walnut. He is missing his left leg from the knee down. He lost it at Trafalgar in 1805, he tells you, to a French cannonball that came through the gun deck while he was loading powder. He's back now because the stump has opened up again after forty years, and the surgeons want to trim it.

Trim it, he says, like it's a hedge.

Silas has opinions about everything. He says the beef tea is boiled boot leather. He says the house surgeon is too young to grow a proper beard, and a man who can't grow a beard shouldn't be trusted with a saw. He says the porter beer is the only honest thing in the building. Then he asks if you're going to finish yours.

You laugh. You hadn't realized how long it had been since you laughed.

He tells you stories at night when the ward is dark. About sailing past Gibraltar. About eating ship's biscuits so full of weevils that the crew would tap them on the table and race the bugs that crawled out. About Admiral Nelson, who got seasick every single voyage of his career and still won every battle. Silas says that's the lesson. You can be sick, scared, and miserable, and still win.

You believe him.

Then, in your second week, you hear the bell.

It rings from the top of the building, a sharp bright clang that cuts through the whole ward. The nurses stop what they're doing. The men in the beds stop talking. Someone near the window crosses himself.

Silas doesn't look up from his beer. Operating day, he says.

A few minutes later, you hear it. Faintly, through two floors of brick, a man screaming. It goes on for what feels like forever. Then it stops. Not fades, but stops. Silas finally takes a sip.

You ask him if the man died. He says, probably not. Usually it just means they're finished.

You lie awake that night staring at the ceiling, listening to your own heartbeat. You're not thinking about the man upstairs. You're thinking about your leg.

Because the smell has started.

It's faint at first. Sweet and rotten, like fruit left in the sun. The nurse changes your dressings and doesn't say anything, but you notice she breathes through her mouth. The swelling spreads up past your knee. The skin around the wound turns from red to purple to a shade of grey that doesn't belong on anything alive. Your fever arrives on the twelfth day and doesn't leave.

The house surgeon comes back. He doesn't press on anything this time. He just looks. Then he says he'll speak to Mr. Liston.

Silas goes very still.

Robert Liston, he tells you, is the most famous surgeon in London. Possibly the world. Six foot two, hands like shovels, and the fastest knife in Britain. Silas has heard he once took off a leg in under thirty seconds. He says students come from all over Europe just to watch him work. He says it like it's good news.

You ask him why it doesn't sound like good news.

Silas thinks for a long time. Then he tells you about the operating theatre. In 1846, there is no way to put a person to sleep for surgery. No gas, no injection, no anything. You are awake. Completely awake. The only mercy a surgeon can offer is speed. The faster he cuts, the less you feel, the less blood you lose, and the less likely you are to die of shock on the table.

So when Silas says Liston is fast, what he means is that Liston is the best thing that can happen to you in the worst room in London.

He gives you advice. Drink all the brandy they offer. Bite down on the leather and don't let go of it, because men have bitten through their own tongues. Don't look at the saw. Look at a spot on the ceiling and count. And whatever happens, don't fight the dressers, the students who hold you down. They're stronger than you, and fighting only makes it last longer.

You nod. You've never been told anything that sounded more like a death sentence in your life.

That Thursday, the bell rings for Silas.

He's in good spirits. He tells the nurse she looks lovely, which she doesn't, and tells you to save him a beer, which you will. Two dressers help him onto a stretcher. At the doorway, he turns around and gives you a salute, the proper naval kind, sharp and crisp.

Keep moving, sailor, he says. You never told him your mother's saying. He just said it.

You hear him upstairs. Not for long. He's an old sailor. He's done this before.

They bring him back an hour later, grey and sweating, but alive. He opens one eye and asks for his beer. You hand it over, and you both laugh, and for one evening, everything is fine.

Then the fever comes for him too.

It isn't his stump. It's the hospital. In 1846, nobody knows what germs are. Surgeons wear the same frock coat for every operation, stiff and black with years of old blood, and they consider this a badge of honour. The more blood on the coat, the more experienced the surgeon. Nobody washes their hands. The same sponges are used on wound after wound. Doctors call what happens next hospital fever, and they accept it the way they accept the weather.

Silas burns for six days. On the fifth night, he talks to people who aren't there. He gives orders to men who drowned forty years ago. On the sixth morning, his bed is empty and the sheets have been changed, and nobody says anything about it.

His beer sits untouched on the shelf above his bed until a nurse takes it away.

You don't cry. You've stopped crying. The fever in your leg has climbed to your thigh, and you're too tired for grief. You just stare at the empty bed and think about what he said. You can be sick, scared, and miserable, and still win.

You decide to believe him. You don't have a choice.

The next Monday, Mr. Liston himself comes to see you.

He's even bigger than Silas described. He fills the doorway. He has a calm, almost bored expression, like a man looking at a broken fence. He peels back the dressing, sniffs once, and covers it again. He tells you plainly that the leg must come off above the knee, and that if it doesn't, the rot will reach your blood and you'll be dead within the week.

Then he tells you the surgery will be on Wednesday, in front of the students. He says it like he's offering you a seat at the theatre. Which, technically, he is.

Your parents visit that night. Your mother holds your hand. Your father stares at your leg and says nothing for a long time. Then he leans in and tells you he'll make you a new one. Oak. The best oak in Southwark. He says it'll be the finest leg in London.

You laugh. He doesn't. He means it.

Your mother kisses your forehead and whispers, keep moving, love.

On Wednesday morning, the bell rings.

The nurse gives you a glass of brandy, then another. You drink both. The house surgeon gives you a dose of laudanum, which makes the ceiling soft at the edges, but does nothing for the dread. Two dressers lift you onto a stretcher and carry you up the stairs. You count them. Forty-two steps.

The operating theatre is round, like a small arena. Wooden benches rise in steep tiers all the way to the skylight, and every one of them is full. Medical students, maybe two hundred of them, packed shoulder to shoulder. Some are eating. Some are taking notes. At the back, someone shouts heads, heads, and the front rows duck so the back rows can see.

In the middle of it all is the table. Plain wood, stained dark. Beneath it, a wooden box filled with sawdust.

You know what the sawdust is for.

They strap you down. Leather across your chest, your arms, your good leg. Four dressers take position, one at each limb. One of them slips a strip of leather between your teeth. He's young, barely older than you, and his hands are shaking.

Then Mr. Liston walks in. The room goes silent. He takes off his jacket and puts on his operating coat, and it's exactly as Silas described. Stiff, black, and crusted with the blood of a thousand people before you. The students lean forward. Liston selects a long, thin knife from his case and holds it between his teeth while he ties the tourniquet around your thigh.

Then he turns to the benches and says, Time me, gentlemen.

The students pull out their pocket watches.

You look at the ceiling. You find a spot, a small brown stain near the skylight, and you start counting.

One.

The knife goes in.

There is no word in English or any other language for what that feels like. It's not pain the way a stubbed toe is pain. It's the whole universe pouring into one place. Your back arches so hard the straps creak. You bite down on the leather and taste blood. The dressers lean on you with their full weight.

Two. Three. Four.

You can hear it. That's the part nobody warns you about. You can hear the knife moving through you. A soft, wet sound, like your mother wringing out washing.

Seven. Eight.

Liston calls for the saw. Somebody hands it to him.

You stop counting.

The sound of the saw on your bone is the loudest sound you have ever heard. Louder than the docks. Louder than the crane. Louder than the bell. It goes on and on and on, and then there's a thud in the sawdust beneath the table, and you understand the thing that thudded used to be you.

Then the needle. The stitches. The bandages.

And then a student calls out, from somewhere high above you, the number. Twenty-eight seconds.

The room applauds.

They are applauding.

You lie on the table, soaked in sweat and brandy and blood, while two hundred young men clap for the man who just sawed off your leg. Liston gives a small nod, wipes his knife on his coat, and walks out without looking at you.

That's how they all remember him. The fastest knife in London.

They carry you back down the forty-two stairs. You don't count them this time.

The first few days are almost hopeful. The stump is clean. The fever drops. The house surgeon says you're healing beautifully and the nurse brings you two pints of porter instead of one. You start thinking about the oak leg your father promised. You picture yourself back at Billingsgate. Not running, not anymore, but walking. Working. Moving.

Your mother visits and laughs for the first time in a month.

Then, on the ninth day, you feel the chill. That deep, shaking cold, even with three blankets on. You know what it is. You've watched it happen once already, in the bed beside you.

The fever comes for you the way it came for Silas. Quietly at first, then all at once. The stump turns hot and swollen and starts to smell sweet. The nurse starts breathing through her mouth again.

The doctors try everything they know. They bleed you, which makes you weaker. They give you more brandy, more laudanum, more beef tea. They're not cruel. They're just doing exactly what doctors have done for three hundred years, and none of it was ever going to work.

On the night of December 20th, 1846, you dream that you're seven years old, racing across London Bridge with both your legs. You're winning. You can hear your mother laughing somewhere behind you, telling you to keep moving.

You don't wake up.

And here's the part nobody tells you.

The very next morning, on December 21st, 1846, in that exact same operating theatre, up those exact same forty-two stairs, Mr. Liston takes off the leg of a butler named Frederick Churchill.

But this time, the patient doesn't scream.

Two months earlier, a dentist in Boston demonstrated something new. A gas called ether. You breathe it through a glass jar, and you fall asleep, and you don't wake up until it's over. The news took weeks to cross the Atlantic by ship. It arrived in London only days ago.

Frederick Churchill breathes the ether, falls asleep on the same table you were strapped to, and feels absolutely nothing. When he wakes up, he asks when the operation is going to start. The students laugh. Liston turns to them and says that this Yankee trick beats mesmerism hollow.

The room applauds again.

You missed it by one day. If the crate had fallen a few weeks later, if the fever had arrived a little slower, if a ship had crossed the Atlantic a little faster, you would have slept through the whole thing.

Within a year, ether is used in hospitals across Britain. Within twenty years, a surgeon named Joseph Lister convinces surgeons to finally clean their hands, their instruments, and their wounds. Within a century, nobody in London is ever strapped awake to that table again.

Historians will write about December 21st, 1846, as one of the greatest days in medical history. They'll print Frederick Churchill's name in textbooks. They'll call Robert Liston a legend. They'll print his time on your leg as a fun fact.

Twenty-eight seconds.

Nobody will write down your name.

But in a barrel workshop in Southwark, an old cooper finishes carving the finest oak leg in London. He sands it smooth for weeks. He never once lets it out of his sight.

And he never tells anyone who it was for.

150	08:45.3	Silas has heard he once took off
151	08:48.2	a leg in under thirty seconds.
152	08:50.7	He says students come from all over
153	08:53.6	Europe just to watch him work.
154	08:56.1	He says it like it's good news.
155	08:59.0	You ask him why it doesn't sound like good news.
156	09:03.2	Silas thinks for a long time.
157	09:05.7	Then he tells you about the operating theatre.
158	09:09.0	In 1846, there is no way to
159	09:11.9	put a person to sleep for surgery.
160	09:14.9	No gas, no injection, no anything. You are awake. Completely awake.
161	09:19.4	The only mercy a surgeon can offer is speed.
162	09:23.2	The faster he cuts, the less you feel,
163	09:26.5	the less blood you lose, and the less likely you are to
164	09:31.5	die of shock on the table.
165	09:34.0	So when Silas says Liston is fast,
166	09:36.9	what he means is that Liston is the best thing that
167	09:41.5	can happen to you in the worst room in London.
168	09:45.7	He gives you advice. Drink all the brandy they offer.
169	09:49.9	Bite down on the leather and don't let go of it,
170	09:54.4	because men have bitten through their own tongues.
171	09:57.8	Don't look at the saw.
172	09:59.9	Look at a spot on the ceiling and count.

173	10:03.6	And whatever happens, don't fight the dressers,
174	10:06.5	the students who hold you down.
175	10:09.0	They're stronger than you, and fighting only makes it last longer.
176	10:13.6	You nod. You've never been told anything that sounded more
177	10:17.8	like a death sentence in your life.
178	10:20.7	That Thursday, the bell rings for Silas.
179	10:23.6	He's in good spirits.
180	10:25.3	He tells the nurse she looks lovely, which she doesn't,
181	10:29.4	and tells you to save him a beer, which you will.
182	10:34.0	Two dressers help him onto a stretcher.
183	10:36.9	At the doorway, he turns around and gives you a salute,
184	10:41.5	the proper naval kind, sharp and crisp.
185	10:44.4	Keep moving, sailor, he says. You never told him your mother's saying.
186	10:49.4	He just said it.
187	10:51.1	You hear him upstairs. Not for long. He's an old sailor.
188	10:55.7	He's done this before.
189	10:57.4	They bring him back an hour later, grey and sweating, but alive.
190	11:02.4	He opens one eye and asks for his beer.
191	11:06.1	You hand it over, and you both laugh, and for one evening,
192	11:11.1	everything is fine.
193	11:12.4	Then the fever comes for him too.
194	11:15.3	It isn't his stump. It's the hospital.
195	11:18.2	In 1846, nobody knows what germs are.
196	11:21.1	Surgeons wear the same frock coat for every operation,
197	11:24.9	stiff and black with years of old blood,
198	11:28.2	and they consider this a badge of honour.
199	11:31.5	The more blood on the coat, the more experienced the surgeon.
200	11:36.1	Nobody washes their hands.
201	11:37.8	The same sponges are used on wound after wound.
202	11:41.5	Doctors call what happens next hospital fever,
203	11:44.4	and they accept it the way they accept the weather.
204	11:48.6	Silas burns for six days.
205	11:50.7	On the fifth night, he talks to people who aren't there.
206	11:55.3	He gives orders to men who drowned forty years ago.
207	11:59.4	On the sixth morning,

208	12:01.1	his bed is empty and the sheets have been changed,
209	12:05.3	and nobody says anything about it.
210	12:07.8	His beer sits untouched on the shelf above
211	12:11.1	his bed until a nurse takes it away.
212	12:14.4	You don't cry. You've stopped crying.
213	12:16.9	The fever in your leg has climbed to your thigh,
214	12:21.1	and you're too tired for grief.
215	12:23.6	You just stare at the empty bed
216	12:26.5	and think about what he said.
217	12:29.0	You can be sick, scared, and miserable, and still win.
218	12:33.2	You decide to believe him. You don't have a choice.
219	12:37.4	The next Monday, Mr. Liston himself comes to see you.
220	12:41.5	He's even bigger than Silas described. He fills the doorway.
221	12:45.7	He has a calm, almost bored expression,
222	12:48.6	like a man looking at a broken fence.
223	12:51.9	He peels back the dressing, sniffs once, and covers it again.
224	12:56.5	He tells you plainly that the leg
225	12:59.4	must come off above the knee, and that if it doesn't,
226	13:04.0	the rot will reach your blood and
227	13:06.9	you'll be dead within the week.
228	13:09.4	Then he tells you the surgery will be on Wednesday,
229	13:13.6	in front of the students.
230	13:15.7	He says it like he's offering you a seat at the theatre.
231	13:20.7	Which, technically, he is.
232	13:22.4	Your parents visit that night. Your mother holds your hand.
233	13:26.5	Your father stares at your leg and
234	13:29.4	says nothing for a long time.
235	13:31.9	Then he leans in and tells you
236	13:34.9	he'll make you a new one. Oak. The best oak in Southwark.
237	13:39.9	He says it'll be the finest leg in London.
238	13:43.6	You laugh. He doesn't. He means it.
239	13:46.5	Your mother kisses your forehead and whispers, keep moving, love.
240	13:50.7	On Wednesday morning, the bell rings.
241	13:53.2	The nurse gives you a glass of brandy, then another.
242	13:57.4	You drink both. The house surgeon gives you a dose of laudanum,

243	14:02.4	which makes the ceiling soft at the edges,
244	14:05.7	but does nothing for the dread.
245	14:08.2	Two dressers lift you onto a stretcher
246	14:11.1	and carry you up the stairs. You count them. Forty-two steps.
247	14:15.7	The operating theatre is round, like a small arena.
248	14:19.4	Wooden benches rise in steep tiers all the way to the skylight,
249	14:24.4	and every one of them is full.
250	14:27.4	Medical students, maybe two hundred of them, packed shoulder to shoulder.
251	14:31.9	Some are eating. Some are taking notes.
252	14:34.9	At the back, someone shouts heads, heads,
253	14:37.8	and the front rows duck so the back rows can see.
254	14:42.4	In the middle of it all is the table.
255	14:46.1	Plain wood, stained dark. Beneath it, a wooden box filled with sawdust.
256	14:51.1	You know what the sawdust is for.
257	14:54.0	They strap you down.
258	14:55.7	Leather across your chest, your arms, your good leg.
259	14:59.4	Four dressers take position, one at each limb.
260	15:02.8	One of them slips a strip of leather between your teeth.
261	15:07.4	He's young, barely older than you, and his hands are shaking.
262	15:11.9	Then Mr. Liston walks in. The room goes silent.
263	15:15.7	He takes off his jacket and puts on his operating coat,
264	15:20.3	and it's exactly as Silas described.
265	15:22.8	Stiff, black, and crusted with the blood
266	15:25.7	of a thousand people before you. The students lean forward.
267	15:29.9	Liston selects a long,
268	15:31.5	thin knife from his case and holds it between his
269	15:35.7	teeth while he ties the tourniquet around your thigh.
270	15:39.4	Then he turns to the benches and says, Time me, gentlemen.
271	15:44.0	The students pull out their pocket watches.
272	15:46.9	You look at the ceiling.
273	15:49.0	You find a spot, a small brown stain near the skylight,
274	15:53.6	and you start counting.
275	15:55.3	One.
276	15:56.5	The knife goes in.
277	15:58.1	There is no word in English or any

278	16:01.5	other language for what that feels like.
279	16:04.4	It's not pain the way a stubbed toe is pain.
280	16:08.6	It's the whole universe pouring into one place.
281	16:11.9	Your back arches so hard the straps creak.
282	16:15.2	You bite down on the leather and taste blood.
283	16:19.0	The dressers lean on you with their full weight.
284	16:22.7	Two. Three. Four.
285	16:24.0	You can hear it. That's the part nobody warns you about.
286	16:28.6	You can hear the knife moving through you.
287	16:31.9	A soft, wet sound, like your mother wringing out washing.
288	16:36.1	Seven. Eight.
289	16:37.3	Liston calls for the saw. Somebody hands it to him.
290	16:41.4	You stop counting.
291	16:42.7	The sound of the saw on your bone
292	16:46.0	is the loudest sound you have ever heard. Louder than the docks.
293	16:51.0	Louder than the crane. Louder than the bell.
294	16:54.3	It goes on and on and on,
295	16:57.3	and then there's a thud in the sawdust beneath the table,
296	17:01.8	and you understand the thing that thudded used to be you.
297	17:06.4	Then the needle. The stitches. The bandages.
298	17:09.3	And then a student calls out, from
299	17:12.3	somewhere high above you, the number. Twenty-eight seconds.
300	17:15.6	The room applauds.
301	17:16.8	They are applauding.
302	17:18.1	You lie on the table, soaked in sweat and brandy and blood,
303	17:23.1	while two hundred young men clap for the
304	17:26.4	man who just sawed off your leg.
305	17:29.3	Liston gives a small nod, wipes his knife on his coat,
306	17:33.9	and walks out without looking at you.
307	17:36.8	That's how they all remember him. The fastest knife in London.
308	17:41.4	They carry you back down the forty-two stairs.
309	17:44.8	You don't count them this time.
310	17:47.3	The first few days are almost hopeful. The stump is clean.
311	17:51.8	The fever drops.
312	17:53.1	The house surgeon says you're healing beautifully and the nurse

313	17:57.3	brings you two pints of porter instead of one.
314	18:01.0	You start thinking about the oak leg your father promised.
315	18:05.2	You picture yourself back at Billingsgate. Not running, not anymore, but walking.
316	18:10.2	Working. Moving.
317	18:11.4	Your mother visits and laughs for the first time in a month.
318	18:16.4	Then, on the ninth day, you feel the chill.
319	18:20.1	That deep, shaking cold, even with three blankets on.
320	18:23.9	You know what it is.
321	18:26.0	You've watched it happen once already, in the bed beside you.
322	18:30.5	The fever comes for you the way it came for Silas.
323	18:35.1	Quietly at first, then all at once.
324	18:38.0	The stump turns hot and swollen and starts to smell sweet.
325	18:42.6	The nurse starts breathing through her mouth again.
326	18:46.0	The doctors try everything they know.
327	18:48.5	They bleed you, which makes you weaker.
328	18:51.4	They give you more brandy, more laudanum, more beef tea.
329	18:55.5	They're not cruel.
330	18:56.8	They're just doing exactly what doctors have done for three hundred years,
331	19:01.8	and none of it was ever going to work.
332	19:05.5	On the night of December 20th, 1846,
333	19:08.5	you dream that you're seven years old,
334	19:11.4	racing across London Bridge with both your legs. You're winning.
335	19:15.5	You can hear your mother laughing somewhere behind you,
336	19:19.3	telling you to keep moving.
337	19:21.4	You don't wake up.
338	19:23.0	And here's the part nobody tells you.
339	19:26.0	The very next morning, on December 21st, 1846, in that exact
340	19:30.5	same operating theatre, up those exact same forty-two stairs,
341	19:34.3	Mr. Liston takes off the leg of a butler named Frederick Churchill.
342	19:39.3	But this time, the patient doesn't scream.
343	19:42.2	Two months earlier, a dentist in Boston demonstrated something new.
344	19:46.4	A gas called ether.
345	19:48.0	You breathe it through a glass jar, and you fall asleep,
346	19:52.6	and you don't wake up until it's over.
347	19:56.0	The news took weeks to cross the Atlantic by ship.

348	20:00.1	It arrived in London only days ago.
349	20:03.0	Frederick Churchill breathes the ether,
350	20:05.1	falls asleep on the same table you were strapped to,
351	20:09.3	and feels absolutely nothing. When he wakes up,
352	20:12.6	he asks when the operation is going to start. The students laugh.
353	20:17.6	Liston turns to them and says that
354	20:20.5	this Yankee trick beats mesmerism hollow.
355	20:23.0	The room applauds again.
356	20:24.7	You missed it by one day.
357	20:27.2	If the crate had fallen a few weeks later,
358	20:31.0	if the fever had arrived a little slower,
359	20:34.3	if a ship had crossed the Atlantic a little faster,
360	20:38.5	you would have slept through the whole thing.
361	20:41.8	Within a year, ether is used in hospitals across Britain.
362	20:46.0	Within twenty years,
363	20:47.2	a surgeon named Joseph Lister convinces surgeons to finally clean their hands,
364	20:52.2	their instruments, and their wounds. Within a century,
365	20:55.5	nobody in London is ever strapped awake to that table again.
366	21:00.1	Historians will write about December 21st, 1846,
367	21:03.0	as one of the greatest days in medical history.
368	21:06.8	They'll print Frederick Churchill's name in textbooks.
369	21:09.7	They'll call Robert Liston a legend.
370	21:12.2	They'll print his time on your leg as a fun fact.
371	21:16.8	Twenty-eight seconds.
372	21:18.0	Nobody will write down your name.
373	21:20.5	But in a barrel workshop in Southwark,
374	21:23.4	an old cooper finishes carving the finest oak leg in London.
375	21:28.0	He sands it smooth for weeks.
376	21:30.5	He never once lets it out of his sight.
377	21:34.2	And he never tells anyone who it was for.

"The year is 1824 and you are born in Southwark, London,"

> Image Prompt: Wide establishing shot, eye level of you as a newborn baby, drawn as a tiny version of the boy variant without the cap: a rounder oversized head about half his total height, a tuft of messy brown hair, freckles on both cheeks, half-lidded deadpan eyes and a gap tooth, on a short solid black stick body with no hands wrapped in a grey cloth bundle held up by your mother (adult woman variant: a slimmer oval oversized head, dark brown hair parted in the middle and gathered into a bun tied with an oxblood ribbon, lashes, half-lidded deadpan eyes and tinted lips, on a solid black stick body with no hands) at a cottage doorway, brewery chimneys smoking behind. Setting: the Southwark riverbank at low tide in the 1820s, grey-brown mudflats, beached barges, smoking brewery chimneys and the dome of St Paul's across the Thames under a pale grey sky. Lighting: flat even overcast daylight, cool grey tint. Mood: quiet, gloomy. Style: 2D digital cartoon illustration in the big-head stick-figure style: oversized semi-realistic caricature heads with fine wrinkle and feature linework and flat skin tones, attached to minimal thick solid-black stick-figure bodies with no hands and no clothing volume; highly detailed, period-accurate hand-drawn background with clean black ink outlines and flat muted colors; desaturated 1840s London palette of soot grey, cream, parchment beige, brick red, Thames brown-green, tallow yellow and faded navy; deadpan dark-comedy tone; no gore, no visible wounds or blood; static 16:9 frame; bottom-right corner kept clear.

"solved with a hammer and enough patience. Your mother takes in washing."

> Image Prompt: Medium shot, eye level of your mother (adult woman variant: a slimmer oval oversized head, dark brown hair parted in the middle and gathered into a bun tied with an oxblood ribbon, lashes, half-lidded deadpan eyes and tinted lips, on a solid black stick body with no hands) scrubbing laundry in a wooden washtub, a mountain of other people's washing piled beside her. Setting: a cramped 1820s Southwark cooper's cottage with low smoke-darkened beams, stacked oak barrels and staves, a steaming wooden washtub, wet laundry on lines and a small window onto the Thames mudflats. Lighting: flat even ambient light, warm tallow-yellow tint. Mood: weary, devoted. Style: 2D digital cartoon illustration in the big-head stick-figure style: oversized semi-realistic caricature heads with fine wrinkle and feature linework and flat skin tones, attached to minimal thick solid-black stick-figure bodies with no hands and no clothing volume; highly detailed, period-accurate hand-drawn background with clean black ink outlines and flat muted colors; desaturated 1840s London palette of soot grey, cream, parchment beige, brick red, Thames brown-green, tallow yellow and faded navy; deadpan dark-comedy tone; no gore, no visible wounds or blood; static 16:9 frame; bottom-right corner kept clear.

> Image Prompt: Medium shot, eye level of you at age 16 (mascot, younger and lankier: an oversized semi-realistic caricature head, messy short brown hair with a spiky fringe, four freckles on each cheek, light stubble on the jaw, half-lidded deadpan eyes, a raised left eyebrow and a flat mouth, wearing a worn grey tweed flat cap, on a solid black stick body with no hands) carrying a wicker basket of silver fish balanced on his head through the dark market. Setting: Billingsgate Fish Market before dawn in the 1840s, crowded cobbles, stacked wicker fish baskets, fishmongers' stalls, gas lamps and ship masts on the Thames behind. Lighting: flat even ambient light, cool blue-grey pre-dawn tint with gas-lamp yellow accents. Mood: strained. Style: 2D digital cartoon illustration in the big-head stick-figure style: oversized semi-realistic caricature heads with fine wrinkle and feature linework and flat skin tones, attached to minimal thick solid-black stick-figure bodies with no hands and no clothing volume; highly detailed, period-accurate hand-drawn background with clean black ink outlines and flat muted colors; desaturated 1840s London palette of soot grey, cream, parchment beige, brick red, Thames brown-green, tallow yellow and faded navy; deadpan dark-comedy tone; no gore, no visible wounds or blood; static 16:9 frame; bottom-right corner kept clear.

> Image Prompt: Wide establishing shot, eye level of University College Hospital at nightfall, gas lamps lit, your father, a broad-faced middle-aged cooper with heavy brows, a short grey-brown beard and a battered flat cap, on a solid black stick body with no hands carrying you, age 22 (mascot: an oversized semi-realistic caricature head, messy short brown hair with a spiky fringe, four freckles on each cheek, light stubble on the jaw, half-lidded deadpan eyes, a raised left eyebrow and a flat mouth, wearing a worn grey tweed flat cap, on a solid black stick body with no hands) up the stone steps. Setting: the grand classical stone front of University College Hospital in 1846 with columns, iron railings, stone steps and gas lamps at the gate. Lighting: flat even ambient light, cool grey-blue evening tint. Mood: night. Style: 2D digital cartoon illustration in the big-head stick-figure style: oversized semi-realistic caricature heads with fine wrinkle and feature linework and flat skin tones, attached to minimal thick solid-black stick-figure bodies with no hands and no clothing volume; highly detailed, period-accurate hand-drawn background with clean black ink outlines and flat muted colors; desaturated 1840s London palette of soot grey, cream, parchment beige, brick red, Thames brown-green, tallow yellow and faded navy; deadpan dark-comedy tone; no gore, no visible wounds or blood; static 16:9 frame; bottom-right corner kept clear.
