1. Script

The year is 1818 and you are born in Buda, on the hilly side of the Danube, in what will one day become Budapest. Your home sits above a grocery shop called The White Elephant, and it smells of coffee beans, dried fruit, and floor polish. Your father owns the shop. He is a careful, prosperous man who counts every coin twice and believes that a son's job is to make his father proud. Your mother runs the household and its ten children with the calm of a general. You are number five.

Being number five teaches you one thing early. If you want to be heard, you have to be loud.

You are loud.

By age 6, you are correcting the customers' arithmetic. By age 9, you are correcting your tutors. By age 12, you have learned that being right and being liked are two completely different things, and you have chosen being right. Your mother tells you that one day your mouth will cost you something important. You tell her that one day she'll be wrong. She laughs. You don't.

Your father has a plan for you. You will become a lawyer, a respectable Austrian lawyer, with a respectable office and respectable clients who pay their bills on time. So in 1837, at age 19, he sends you to Vienna, the capital of the Austrian Empire, to study law.

You last about a year.

One afternoon, a friend drags you into a lecture hall at the medical school. There's a body on the table. A professor is taking it apart, piece by piece, explaining how each part failed. The room smells of vinegar and rot. Students are fainting in the back rows.

You don't faint. You lean forward.

For the first time in your life, you're looking at something that can't argue back. The body doesn't have opinions. It just has evidence. Causes and effects. Questions with answers. You walk out of that room and never go back to law school.

Your father is not thrilled. But you're the fifth child of ten. He has other sons to be proud of.

Years pass, and in 1844, you earn your medical degree. Two years later, you land the job of your dreams. Assistant physician at the First Obstetric Clinic of the Vienna General Hospital. The biggest maternity hospital in the world.

The first month is disorienting in the best possible way. The hospital is enormous, a city within a city, with courtyards and chapels and thousands of beds. You have a salary. You have a title. You have a room in the hospital itself. Students follow you down the corridors taking notes. Your mother writes to tell you the whole neighbourhood back home is talking about you.

You decide that this was absolutely worth disappointing your father.

Your days have a rhythm. In the morning, before dawn, you go down to the dead house, the hospital morgue, where you and the students perform autopsies on the women who died the day before. You study their organs. You take notes. You learn. Then, around nine, you walk upstairs to the maternity wards to examine the women who are still alive.

You don't wash your hands in between. Nobody does. Why would you? There's no reason to. You wipe them on your coat, like every doctor in Europe.

You don't know it yet, but that walk up the stairs is the most dangerous walk in Vienna.

Then the women start begging.

It happens on your second week. A young woman arrives at the hospital gate in labour, holding her belly, and when the porter tells her she's been assigned to the First Clinic, your clinic, she drops to her knees. She grabs your coat. She cries and pleads and begs you to send her anywhere else. The Second Clinic. The street. Anywhere.

You're confused. You ask the porter what's wrong with her. He shrugs. They all do that, he says.

You find out why that night.

The Vienna General Hospital has two maternity clinics, side by side, sharing the same building and the same entrance. Women are admitted to them on alternate days. The only real difference is who works there. The Second Clinic is run by midwives. The First Clinic, your clinic, is run by doctors and medical students.

And in your clinic, the mothers die.

Not a few of them. In some months, one in every ten women who gives birth in your wards dies of childbed fever. Some months, it's closer to one in three. They give birth to healthy babies, and then, a day or two later, the fever comes. The chills. The swelling. The pain. And within a week, they're gone.

In the Second Clinic, run by midwives with half your training, the death rate is a fraction of yours.

Everyone in Vienna knows this. The poor women know it best of all. That's why they beg. Some of them deliberately give birth in the street outside, in carriages, in doorways, so they can arrive with a baby already in their arms. And here's the strange part. Even the women who give birth in the gutter almost never catch the fever.

You can't stop thinking about it.

You think about the woman who grabbed your coat on your second week. Her name was Anna. She was a laundress, twenty years old, and she had a healthy baby boy, loud and red-faced. You delivered him yourself. She smiled at you afterward, as if to say, see, I was worried for nothing.

Three days later, she had the fever. Five days later, you signed her death certificate. Her son was sent to the foundling home across the street.

You keep the certificate in your desk drawer. You don't know why.

The senior doctors have explanations. Miasma, bad air drifting in from the city. Overcrowding. The women's fear. Their modesty, offended by male doctors. Cosmic influences. Atmospheric conditions. Your boss, Professor Johann Klein, a stiff, careful man who has run the clinic for years, tells you it's simply the nature of the place. Some clinics are unlucky.

But the air is the same in both clinics. The building is the same. The weather is the same.

The numbers don't lie. Something is different. And you are going to find out what it is.

Your only real friend at the hospital is Jakob Kolletschka. He's a professor of forensic medicine, fifteen years older than you, with a round, cheerful face and a habit of humming opera badly during autopsies. He's the only senior doctor who doesn't roll his eyes when you start talking about your numbers. Instead, he pours you a drink and tells you to talk slower.

He becomes your favourite person in Vienna.

He's also the only person who can make you laugh in the dead house. When a student faints, Kolletschka steps over him without missing a note of his opera. When Professor Klein gives a speech about atmospheric influences, Kolletschka leans over and whispers that the only atmospheric influence in this hospital is Klein's breath. You have to leave the room so no one sees your face.

Kolletschka teaches you how to read a body properly. How every organ tells a story if you're patient enough to listen. In the evenings, the two of you walk along the Danube canal and argue about everything. Politics. Philosophy. Whether Viennese coffee is better than Hungarian coffee. He says it is. You tell him he's wrong. He says you think everyone is wrong. You tell him that's because they usually are.

He laughs so hard he has to sit down on a bench.

He tells you something one night that you never forget. That a good doctor follows the evidence, even when it leads somewhere ugly. Especially then.

You start testing everything. You change the way women lie in bed during labour, to match the Second Clinic. Nothing changes. You improve ventilation. Nothing. You even convince the hospital priest to stop walking through your wards ringing his little bell before giving last rites, in case the sound of it is frightening the mothers to death. He takes a different route. The women still die.

Professor Klein starts watching you more closely. He doesn't like assistants who ask questions he can't answer.

In the spring of 1847, exhausted and frustrated, you take a short holiday to Venice with friends. You look at paintings. You eat well. You sleep for the first time in months. For three weeks, you almost forget the First Clinic exists.

Then you come home, and someone meets you at the hospital with a face you'll never forget.

Kolletschka is dead.

It happened while you were gone. During a routine autopsy, a student's scalpel slipped and nicked Kolletschka's finger. A tiny cut. Barely worth a bandage. Within days, he had a fever. The chills. The swelling. The pain.

And within a week, he was gone.

You don't cry at first. You do what he taught you. You read his autopsy report.

And there it is, on the page, in plain ink. The inflamed tissue. The swelling. The pus. The damage to his organs. You've seen it hundreds of times before. On the table in the dead house. In the bodies of the mothers from your clinic.

Your friend, a grown man who never gave birth to anything, died of the exact same disease as the women in your wards.

Something cold settles in your stomach.

The knife that killed Kolletschka came from a corpse. It carried something from the dead body into his living one. Something invisible. Something deadly. And you think about your mornings. The dead house at dawn. Your hands inside the bodies of the dead women. Then the walk upstairs. Your hands, still unwashed, examining the living ones.

The midwives in the Second Clinic don't do autopsies. The women who give birth in the street never see a doctor at all.

You sit very still for a long time.

It isn't the air. It isn't fear. It isn't the priest's bell.

It's you.

It's your hands. The doctors' hands. The students' hands. Every morning, you have been carrying death up the stairs on your fingers and delivering it to the mothers yourself. You've examined hundreds of them. How many did you kill? You try to count, and then you stop, because you can't bear the number.

The numbers don't lie.

In May 1847, you put a basin by the entrance to the wards. It's filled with chlorinated lime, a bleach solution you chose because it destroys the smell of the dead house completely. If it kills the smell, you reason, it might kill whatever is causing it. You announce a new rule. Every doctor and every student, before touching a single patient, scrubs their hands in the basin until the smell of corpses is gone.

The students hate it. The chlorine stings. It cracks their skin and turns their knuckles raw. They mutter. They complain. Some of them try to sneak past.

You stand by the basin and you make them do it anyway. Every single time.

One morning, a student comes straight up from the dead house, still smelling of corpses, and walks right past you toward a woman in labour. You grab his arm so hard he yelps. You march him back to the basin and hold his hands in the chlorine until he swears he'll never skip it again. By lunchtime, the whole hospital is calling you a tyrant.

You decide you can live with that.

And then, the numbers change.

In April, before the basin, almost one in five mothers in your clinic died. By June, it's about one in fifty. By the following year, there are entire months where not a single mother in the First Clinic dies of childbed fever.

Not one.

The midwives from the Second Clinic come over to look at your ledgers. Even the porter at the gate notices. For the first time in years, women assigned to the First Clinic walk through the doors without crying.

You've just found a way to save thousands of lives. With soap and a bucket. You sit in your room with your ledgers and you laugh until you cry, and then you just cry. You think about Kolletschka. You wish he could see these numbers.

You assume the medical world is about to celebrate you.

You assume wrong.

Because what you're actually telling the most respected doctors in Europe is this. Gentlemen, you've been killing your patients. With your own hands. For years.

They do not take it well.

Doctors in 1847 are gentlemen. Educated, respectable, important men. And a gentleman's hands, they insist, are clean. The idea that they themselves have been spreading death is not just wrong, it's insulting. Some of them say your theory is nonsense. Others say it's unscientific, since you can't explain exactly what these invisible particles are. You can't even see them. You just have numbers.

And your personality isn't helping. You're still the loud fifth child from the grocery shop. You don't persuade people. You correct them.

Professor Klein is furious. Your success makes his clinic look like a slaughterhouse, and makes him look like the butcher. In 1849, when your contract comes up for renewal, he simply doesn't renew it.

Just like that, you're out.

Without you there, standing by the basin, the students stop washing. They always hated it anyway. You hear the numbers start climbing again, and there's nothing you can do about it.

In 1850, after a final humiliation at the university, you pack your bags and leave Vienna without saying goodbye to anyone. Not even your few remaining friends.

You go home to Hungary.

In Pest, you take an unpaid position at a small, run down hospital called St. Rochus. Its maternity ward is a disaster. You introduce your basin. The death rate collapses again, to almost nothing. Later, you become a professor of obstetrics at the University of Pest. You marry. You have children. For a few years, life is almost good. You teach your students to wash. You walk your children along the Danube, the way you once walked with Kolletschka. Some evenings you even forget to talk about childbed fever.

Some evenings.

But you can't let it go. You know thousands of women are still dying every year in hospitals across Europe, from something that could be stopped with a bucket of bleach. And nobody is listening.

In 1861, you finally publish your book. Five hundred pages of evidence. Tables. Charts. Years of numbers.

The reviews are savage. Doctors across Europe dismiss it, ignore it, or laugh at it.

So you start writing letters. Open letters, to the most famous obstetricians in Europe, published for the public to read. You stop being polite. You call them ignorant. You call them irresponsible.

Then you call them murderers.

Your wife notices the change first. You talk about childbed fever at dinner. You talk about it at parties. You talk about it to strangers in the street. You can't sleep. You can't stop. You start drinking. You start forgetting things. Your colleagues at the university begin to whisper.

You still have the numbers. But nobody wants to hear them anymore.

In the summer of 1865, an old colleague from Vienna, a respected doctor you once trusted, invites you to visit a new medical institute he wants to show you. Your wife comes with you. It's a long journey. You're tired. You're curious.

You've just turned 47 when you walk through the gates.

It isn't a medical institute. It's an asylum.

You realize it the moment the doors close behind you. You turn around. Your colleague is already leaving. You try to follow him. Attendants grab your arms. You fight. You've always fought. You've fought Klein. You've fought Vienna. You've fought all of Europe.

But this time, you lose.

The guards beat you. They kick you. They force you into a straitjacket and lock you in a dark cell. Somewhere in the struggle, you're injured. A wound on your hand. You barely notice it at first.

Within days, the fever comes.

The chills. The swelling. The pain.

You know exactly what it is. You've seen it a thousand times. On the table in the dead house. In the bodies of the mothers. In the autopsy report of your friend.

Nobody in that asylum washes their hands.

Two weeks after you arrive, on August 13th, 1865, you die of an infected wound. Childbed fever in everything but name. The same disease you spent your life fighting. Killed by the same dirty hands.

Very few people come to your funeral. The medical societies barely mention it.

When your family clears out your desk, they find years of letters, tables, and ledgers. And at the very back of a drawer, folded and yellowed, an old death certificate from the First Clinic. A laundress named Anna. Twenty years old. Cause of death, childbed fever.

Nobody knows why you kept it. Nobody asks.

And here's the part nobody tells you.

Within two years of your death, a surgeon in Scotland named Joseph Lister begins cleaning his wounds and instruments with chemicals, and his patients stop dying. In France, a chemist named Louis Pasteur proves that invisible living organisms, germs, cause disease. The particles you couldn't see were real. Every number you ever wrote was right.

Within a few decades, every hospital in the world requires doctors to wash their hands.

Today, a university in Budapest carries your name. Scientists even named a reflex after you. The Semmelweis reflex. It describes the instinct to reject new evidence because it contradicts what everyone already believes.

They named the stubbornness after you. Not the doctors who were stubborn. You.

Your name is Ignaz Semmelweis.

And the next time you stand at a sink and wash your hands for twenty seconds without thinking about it, remember that someone once lost everything for asking you to do it.

The numbers never lied.

They just took the world fifty years to read them.

152	09:03.3	You change the way women lie in bed during labour,
153	09:07.5	to match the Second Clinic. Nothing changes. You improve ventilation. Nothing.
154	09:12.0	You even convince the hospital priest to stop walking through
155	09:16.2	your wards ringing his little bell before giving last rites,
156	09:20.4	in case the sound of it is frightening the mothers to death.
157	09:25.4	He takes a different route. The women still die.
158	09:29.1	Professor Klein starts watching you more closely.
159	09:32.0	He doesn't like assistants who ask questions he can't answer.
160	09:36.2	In the spring of 1847, exhausted and frustrated,
161	09:39.5	you take a short holiday to Venice with friends.
162	09:43.3	You look at paintings. You eat well.
163	09:46.2	You sleep for the first time in months.
164	09:49.5	For three weeks, you almost forget the First Clinic exists.
165	09:53.7	Then you come home, and someone meets you at the hospital
166	09:58.3	with a face you'll never forget.
167	10:00.8	Kolletschka is dead.
168	10:02.0	It happened while you were gone.
169	10:04.5	During a routine autopsy, a student's scalpel slipped and nicked Kolletschka's finger.
170	10:09.5	A tiny cut. Barely worth a bandage.

171	10:12.5	Within days, he had a fever. The chills. The swelling. The pain.
172	10:17.5	And within a week, he was gone.
173	10:20.4	You don't cry at first. You do what he taught you.
174	10:25.0	You read his autopsy report.
175	10:27.0	And there it is, on the page, in plain ink.
176	10:31.2	The inflamed tissue. The swelling. The pus. The damage to his organs.
177	10:36.2	You've seen it hundreds of times before.
178	10:39.1	On the table in the dead house.
179	10:42.0	In the bodies of the mothers from your clinic.
180	10:45.8	Your friend, a grown man who never gave birth to anything,
181	10:50.4	died of the exact same disease as the women in your wards.
182	10:55.4	Something cold settles in your stomach.
183	10:57.9	The knife that killed Kolletschka came from a corpse.
184	11:01.6	It carried something from the dead body into his living one.
185	11:06.2	Something invisible. Something deadly. And you think about your mornings.
186	11:10.4	The dead house at dawn.
187	11:12.5	Your hands inside the bodies of the dead women.
188	11:16.2	Then the walk upstairs. Your hands, still unwashed, examining the living ones.
189	11:21.2	The midwives in the Second Clinic don't do autopsies.
190	11:25.0	The women who give birth in the
191	11:27.9	street never see a doctor at all.
192	11:30.8	You sit very still for a long time.
193	11:34.1	It isn't the air. It isn't fear. It isn't the priest's bell.
194	11:39.1	It's you.
195	11:40.3	It's your hands. The doctors' hands. The students' hands.
196	11:44.1	Every morning, you have been carrying death up the stairs on
197	11:48.7	your fingers and delivering it to the mothers yourself.
198	11:52.4	You've examined hundreds of them. How many did you kill?
199	11:56.6	You try to count, and then you stop,
200	11:59.9	because you can't bear the number.
201	12:02.4	The numbers don't lie.
202	12:04.1	In May 1847,
203	12:05.3	you put a basin by the entrance to the wards.
204	12:09.5	It's filled with chlorinated lime,
205	12:11.6	a bleach solution you chose because it destroys

206	12:14.9	the smell of the dead house completely.
207	12:17.8	If it kills the smell, you reason,
208	12:20.7	it might kill whatever is causing it. You announce a new rule.
209	12:25.7	Every doctor and every student, before touching a single patient,
210	12:29.9	scrubs their hands in the basin until
211	12:32.8	the smell of corpses is gone.
212	12:35.3	The students hate it. The chlorine stings.
213	12:38.2	It cracks their skin and turns their knuckles raw. They mutter.
214	12:42.8	They complain. Some of them try to sneak past.
215	12:46.6	You stand by the basin and you make them do it anyway.
216	12:51.6	Every single time.
217	12:52.8	One morning, a student comes straight up from the dead house,
218	12:57.4	still smelling of corpses,
219	12:59.1	and walks right past you toward a woman in labour.
220	13:03.2	You grab his arm so hard he yelps.
221	13:06.6	You march him back to the basin and hold his hands
222	13:11.2	in the chlorine until he swears he'll never skip it again.
223	13:15.7	By lunchtime, the whole hospital is calling you a tyrant.
224	13:19.9	You decide you can live with that.
225	13:22.8	And then, the numbers change.
226	13:24.9	In April, before the basin,
227	13:27.0	almost one in five mothers in your clinic died.
228	13:30.7	By June, it's about one in fifty. By the following year,
229	13:35.3	there are entire months where not a single mother
230	13:39.1	in the First Clinic dies of childbed fever.
231	13:42.4	Not one.
232	13:43.6	The midwives from the Second Clinic come
233	13:46.5	over to look at your ledgers.
234	13:49.0	Even the porter at the gate notices.
235	13:51.9	For the first time in years,
236	13:54.4	women assigned to the First Clinic walk through the doors without crying.
237	13:59.4	You've just found a way to save thousands of lives.
238	14:03.6	With soap and a bucket. You sit in your room with your
239	14:08.6	ledgers and you laugh until you cry, and then you just cry.
240	14:13.6	You think about Kolletschka. You wish he could see these numbers.

241	14:18.2	You assume the medical world is about to celebrate you.
242	14:22.4	You assume wrong.
243	14:23.6	Because what you're actually telling the most
244	14:26.5	respected doctors in Europe is this. Gentlemen, you've been killing your patients.
245	14:31.5	With your own hands. For years.
246	14:34.0	They do not take it well.
247	14:36.5	Doctors in 1847 are gentlemen. Educated, respectable, important men.
248	14:40.3	And a gentleman's hands, they insist, are clean.
249	14:43.6	The idea that they themselves have been
250	14:46.5	spreading death is not just wrong, it's insulting.
251	14:49.9	Some of them say your theory is nonsense. Others say it's unscientific,
252	14:54.9	since you can't explain exactly what these invisible particles are.
253	14:59.0	You can't even see them. You just have numbers.
254	15:02.8	And your personality isn't helping.
255	15:04.9	You're still the loud fifth child from the grocery shop.
256	15:09.0	You don't persuade people. You correct them.
257	15:11.9	Professor Klein is furious.
258	15:13.6	Your success makes his clinic look like a slaughterhouse,
259	15:17.4	and makes him look like the butcher.
260	15:20.3	In 1849, when your contract comes up for renewal,
261	15:24.0	he simply doesn't renew it.
262	15:26.1	Just like that, you're out.
263	15:28.2	Without you there, standing by the basin, the students stop washing.
264	15:32.8	They always hated it anyway. You hear the numbers start climbing again,
265	15:37.8	and there's nothing you can do about it.
266	15:41.1	In 1850, after a final humiliation at the university,
267	15:44.9	you pack your bags and leave Vienna without saying goodbye to anyone.
268	15:49.9	Not even your few remaining friends.
269	15:52.4	You go home to Hungary.
270	15:54.4	In Pest, you take an unpaid position at a small,
271	15:58.6	run down hospital called St. Rochus. Its maternity ward is a disaster.
272	16:03.6	You introduce your basin. The death rate collapses again, to almost nothing.
273	16:08.6	Later, you become a professor of obstetrics at the University of Pest.
274	16:13.6	You marry. You have children.
275	16:15.7	For a few years, life is almost good.

276	16:19.0	You teach your students to wash.
277	16:21.5	You walk your children along the Danube,
278	16:24.4	the way you once walked with Kolletschka.
279	16:27.4	Some evenings you even forget to talk about childbed fever.
280	16:31.5	Some evenings.
281	16:32.7	But you can't let it go.
282	16:35.2	You know thousands of women are still
283	16:38.1	dying every year in hospitals across Europe,
284	16:41.1	from something that could be stopped with a bucket of bleach.
285	16:45.6	And nobody is listening.
286	16:47.3	In 1861, you finally publish your book. Five hundred pages of evidence.
287	16:52.3	Tables. Charts. Years of numbers.
288	16:54.4	The reviews are savage.
289	16:56.1	Doctors across Europe dismiss it, ignore it, or laugh at it.
290	17:00.6	So you start writing letters.
291	17:02.7	Open letters, to the most famous obstetricians in Europe,
292	17:06.5	published for the public to read. You stop being polite.
293	17:10.6	You call them ignorant. You call them irresponsible.
294	17:14.0	Then you call them murderers.
295	17:16.1	Your wife notices the change first.
296	17:18.6	You talk about childbed fever at dinner.
297	17:21.5	You talk about it at parties.
298	17:24.0	You talk about it to strangers in the street. You can't sleep.
299	17:29.0	You can't stop. You start drinking. You start forgetting things.
300	17:33.1	Your colleagues at the university begin to whisper.
301	17:36.5	You still have the numbers. But nobody wants to hear them anymore.
302	17:41.5	In the summer of 1865, an old colleague from Vienna,
303	17:45.6	a respected doctor you once trusted,
304	17:48.1	invites you to visit a new medical
305	17:51.1	institute he wants to show you. Your wife comes with you.
306	17:55.6	It's a long journey. You're tired. You're curious.
307	17:59.0	You've just turned 47 when you walk through the gates.
308	18:03.1	It isn't a medical institute. It's an asylum.
309	18:06.5	You realize it the moment the doors close behind you.
310	18:10.6	You turn around. Your colleague is already leaving.

311	18:14.0	You try to follow him. Attendants grab your arms. You fight.
312	18:18.6	You've always fought. You've fought Klein. You've fought Vienna.
313	18:22.3	You've fought all of Europe.
314	18:24.4	But this time, you lose.
315	18:26.5	The guards beat you. They kick you.
316	18:29.4	They force you into a straitjacket and
317	18:32.3	lock you in a dark cell. Somewhere in the struggle, you're injured.
318	18:37.3	A wound on your hand. You barely notice it at first.
319	18:41.9	Within days, the fever comes.
320	18:44.0	The chills. The swelling. The pain.
321	18:46.5	You know exactly what it is. You've seen it a thousand times.
322	18:51.5	On the table in the dead house.
323	18:54.4	In the bodies of the mothers.
324	18:56.9	In the autopsy report of your friend.
325	18:59.8	Nobody in that asylum washes their hands.
326	19:02.7	Two weeks after you arrive, on August 13th, 1865,
327	19:06.5	you die of an infected wound. Childbed fever in everything but name.
328	19:11.5	The same disease you spent your life fighting.
329	19:14.8	Killed by the same dirty hands.
330	19:17.3	Very few people come to your funeral.
331	19:20.2	The medical societies barely mention it.
332	19:22.7	When your family clears out your desk, they find years of letters,
333	19:27.7	tables, and ledgers.
334	19:29.0	And at the very back of a drawer, folded and yellowed,
335	19:33.6	an old death certificate from the First Clinic. A laundress named Anna.
336	19:38.6	Twenty years old. Cause of death, childbed fever.
337	19:41.9	Nobody knows why you kept it. Nobody asks.
338	19:45.2	And here's the part nobody tells you.
339	19:48.1	Within two years of your death,
340	19:50.6	a surgeon in Scotland named Joseph Lister begins
341	19:54.0	cleaning his wounds and instruments with chemicals, and his patients stop dying.
342	19:59.0	In France, a chemist named Louis Pasteur proves that invisible living organisms,
343	20:04.0	germs, cause disease. The particles you couldn't see were real.
344	20:08.1	Every number you ever wrote was right.
345	20:11.1	Within a few decades,

346	20:12.7	every hospital in the world requires doctors to wash their hands.
347	20:17.3	Today, a university in Budapest carries your name.
348	20:20.6	Scientists even named a reflex after you. The Semmelweis reflex.
349	20:24.8	It describes the instinct to reject new evidence
350	20:28.1	because it contradicts what everyone already believes.
351	20:31.1	They named the stubbornness after you. Not the doctors who were stubborn.
352	20:36.1	You.
353	20:37.3	Your name is Ignaz Semmelweis.
354	20:39.3	And the next time you stand at a sink and
355	20:43.5	wash your hands for twenty seconds without thinking about it,
356	20:47.7	remember that someone once lost everything for asking you to do it.
357	20:52.7	The numbers never lied.
358	20:54.3	They just took the world fifty years to read them.

"The year is 1818 and you are born in Buda,"

> Image Prompt: Wide establishing shot, eye level of your mother (adult woman variant: a slimmer oval oversized head, dark brown hair parted in the middle and gathered into a bun tied with an oxblood ribbon, lashes, half-lidded deadpan eyes and tinted lips, on a solid black stick body with no hands) holding you as a newborn baby, a tiny version of the boy variant with a tuft of messy brown hair and no cap in a bundle at an upstairs window above a grocery shop, a Buda street below. Setting: a sloping cobbled street in 1820s Buda with pastel baroque houses, a grocery shopfront below, the castle hill and the Danube in the distance. Lighting: flat even daylight, soft warm tint. Mood: warm, establishing. Style: 2D digital cartoon illustration in the big-head stick-figure style: oversized semi-realistic caricature heads with fine wrinkle and feature linework and flat skin tones, attached to minimal thick solid-black stick-figure bodies with no hands and no clothing volume; highly detailed, period-accurate hand-drawn background with clean black ink outlines and flat muted colors; desaturated 1840s Habsburg palette of stone grey, cream, parchment beige, Habsburg ochre, slate blue, brick red, sage green and ink brown; deadpan dark-comedy tone; no gore, no visible wounds, blood or nudity; static 16:9 frame; bottom-right corner kept clear.
